treated? Do you have chlordane on hand to use in the bank? Are you going to put wire around the plants and then fill with leaves or paper? These may give you some idea to use this year.

The writer has talked with some of the members at the shows this year that went through the freeze in the Jacksonville and other northern areas and they have indicated that they have found a better way than heating. They use mist. This will need a little explaining though.

Mr. & Mrs. C. E. Landers have some plants that are well over six feet high that went through the Jax freeze and never dropped a leaf. These were in the ground beside a pen. He covered them with a temporary frame and put a couple of mist nozzles inside the plastic. When the temperature dropped below the freezing mark he had the mist going. Ice formed on the inside of the plastic but only a thin sheet. The plants never did have a bit of ice on them.

Another man had two greenhouses. He fired one and used the mist idea in the other. He says the misted house was warmer than the fired one. He further says that he will not fire again. Will just use mist.

Another idea you might think about if you have the yard plantings in double rows. You could take the wire mesh like the contractors use in cement reinforcing to make an arch over the plants. Then this could be covered by unrolling a sheet of plastic on top. The plastic would have to be weighted to the ground to keep it there. Then run a few mist nozzles inside this tent-like cover. After danger of the freeze is over the plastic could be taken off and put aside for the next time.

Then too you can also leave the plants in the cans and carry them in the house or garage and heat. Our friends in the north who grow the tropicals have to do this. 'Tis work but worth it.

Whatever method you use if you have good results let us know so that we can pass it on to our friends that may not have thought of just that method.

See you all in the Spring.

When a census-taker called on a Blue Ridge Mountain woman who was the mother of nine children and expecting a tenth, the woman said to him, "I sure am tired of having babies."

"Then why don't you stop?" he asked.

"Only way I know of to keep the youngest from being spoiled," she explained.

The wife suing for divorce was telling her troubles in court. "We were happy for a year, your honor, and then the baby came."

"Boy or girl?" inquired the judge.

"Girl," the woman replied, "big, fat, blonde and painted, and she moved in next door."

The codfish lays 10,000 eggs,
The homely hen lays one.
The codfish never cackles
To tell you what she's done.

And so we scorn the codfish
While the humble hen we prize,
Which only goes to show you---
It pays to ADVERTISE.
